Whipworms

Fleas, ticks and worms. Small enemies, but big issues.

External parasites.

Dogs are at risk from both fleas and ticks in New Zealand. Adult fleas seen on pets represent just 5% of the total flea population. The other 95% is made up of eggs, larvae and pupae which can be found developing in gardens, homes and parks. Ticks are found in many outdoor locations, not only rural areas but also urban parks and gardens.

Fleas

- Fleas are the most common external parasite of dogs in New Zealand and are best controlled with monthly year round treatment
- Fleas can lead to serious discomfort, allergic dermatitis, tapeworm infection and anaemia

Ticks

- Ticks are an increasing problem and can be active even during cooler months
- Tick infestations can lead to skin irritation, discomfort, abscesses and anaemia in young animals

Internal parasites.

Worms may be an issue for your dog, but you and your family can also become infected by some of these parasites.

Gastrointestinal nematodes (roundworms, hookworms, whipworms)

- Gastrointestinal worms are a common problem in dogs. Puppies are particularly susceptible and can even be infected from their mothers before birth. Intestinal parasitic infection may cause growth disorders, anaemia, diarrhoea and vomiting
- Dogs of all ages can be infected with worms and suffer from reduced health, anaemia and diarrhoea
- Worm eggs can be resistant and survive in the environment for years to become an on-going source of infection for dogs, and in some cases posing a health risk to humans

Regular treatment against worms helps to protect your dog's health and reduce environmental contamination which is important to protect human health.
